FORMER NAZI COLLEAGUES OF EICHMANN, WHO TESTIFIED IN WEST GERMANY RECENTLY, AND WERE HEARD IN TRIAL IN JERUSALEM THROUGH CERTIFIED TRANSCRIPTS, STUCK BY THEIR TESTIMONY OF YEARS AGO AT NUREMBERG, WITH DAMAGING EFFECT ON "THE GREAT EXPEDITER OF DEATH"

Adolf Eichmann feared toward the close of World War II that he was the Allied nations' Number One war criminal for his part in the extermination of Europe's Jews, a former war-time Nazi collaborator testified by proxy at Eichmann's trial in Jerusalem.

Another proxy witness, a former fellow SS (Nazi Elite Guard) officer, testified Eichmann carried out Hitler's program of exterminating Jews even against the wishes of Heinrich Himmler, the SS and Gestapo chief, says the New York Herald Tribune. Describing Eichmann as "a convinced Nazi and fanatical anti-Semite," the witness' deposition told of a heated meeting between Eichmann and Himmler in a German Army staff car parked in a woods. Himmler, the witness said, shouted at Eichmann:

"If until now you have been an exterminator of the Jews, so now I order that you must become a person who deals with Jews very considerately. Remember I am the one who gives orders. If you cannot comply, then you must tell me."

Nevertheless, the witness said, Eichmann went ahead with the "death march" of 25,000 Hungarian Jews toward the Austrian frontier despite Himmler's order to stop it. Most of those who made the march died of starvation or disease.

The Nazi collaborator's deposition said Eichmann told him in Budapest after the Romanian war front collapsed that he estimated four million Jews died in the death camps. He said another two million were killed by the bullets of the special extermination squads, the witness reported.

He was one of five former Nazi colleagues of Eichmann who gave testimony for or against him in West Germany recently and were heard in the trial through certified transcripts of what they said in the special German court proceedings held at the request of the Israeli government.

The witness said Eichmann made his admissions during an introspective hour of brandy-gulping reminiscence, when he said the two men would not meet again. The other witnesses also gave damaging testimony. One of them depicted Eichmann as making his own decisions in his actions against the Jews.

Another witness said he himself had been appalled at what was being done to the Jews and that he had tried to help them, whereas Eichmann had taken the opposite course, says the New York Herald Tribune. Still another said German Army commanders had refused to exterminate Communists, and implied Eichmann could have done the same.

During some of the testimony, especially when he was depicted as a hard-drinking man, Eichmann grinned and at times clasped his hands over his mouth as if to smother laughter. But at other times the damaging effect of the testimony seemed to cause him much uneasiness, and his mouth was twisted in his characteristic contorted expression as of inner pain.

The witnesses were:

Dr. Wilhelm Hoettl, now living in Austria, who was an official of the Nazi head security service intelligence department during the war, and who called Eichmann "the great expediter of death".

Kurt Andreas Ernst Becher, who was an SS associate and occasional rival of Eichmann under Himmler. It was he who described the Eichmann-Himmler clash.

Horst Theodor Grell, former Jewish affairs adviser attached to the Nazi embassy in Budapest.

Former Nazi Gen. Hans Juettner, Himmler's personal adjutant.

Dr. Eberhardt von Thadden, head of the Jewish department for the Nazi Foreign Ministry in Berlin.

Walter Huppenkothen, an official of the Nazi head security service office.

The last four all live in West Germany.

Hoettl's testimony was given in Bad Aussee, Austria, June 19. Hoettl described himself as forty-six, a Roman Catholic, married, and as principal of the Bad Aussee private secondary school for boys, says the New York Herald Tribune. Saying Eichmann's wartime scope of activities extended over the whole of Austria, he testified that the accused, though a native of Austria, spoke "with superciliousness and haughtiness characteristic of North Germany."

He described Eichmann's Vienna office during the period of the Jewish evacuations as comprising about thirty people and said it was an independently-run department. He said that "so far as Jewish questions were concerned only Eichmann's department dealt with them, and that refers to the entire territory under control of Germany."

He said that Eichmann's office enjoyed a particular status, but that Eichmann was not, as some other former Nazis have said, especially close to his fellow townsman and superior, Ernst Kaltenbrunner, on whom Eichmann now blames much of his anti-Jewish activity.

Hoettl fixed the date of the mass executions and liquidations behind the Russian battle fronts as beginning in the summer of 1941, and he said that the order to liquidate Russian political commissars apparently came from Hitler and occurred at about the same time as the Jewish executions began.

Huppenkothen said he was fifty-three and a clerk, of Cologne, Germany.

Huppenkothen indicated Eichmann's powers were considerable because his office functioned under military law and the person having jurisdiction over a matter had full authority to investigate, lodge a complaint and render a decision. He could close a file if he wished or order summary disciplinary action and indeed he was "so strong that many matters depended on his influence alone."

As to Eichmann personally, the witness testified, he had a special position, being attached to his bureau (IV B 4) in his capacity as an SS man, not as an ordinary functionary, says the New York Herald Tribune. Huppenkothen added: "There he had a special position because he had no contact at all with the head of the division, but rather he would always refer directly to the head of the bureau, Mueller, to whom he had direct access."

Adolf Eichmann, wilting under the first blast of cross-examination, admitted moral guilt as an accomplice in the wartime annihilation of millions of Jews by the Nazis, says the New York Times. But he insisted that legally he was innocent. He protested that he had been a soldier under orders and that the legal guilt lay with those who had given the orders.

Deathly pale, swaying slightly in his bullet-proof glass dock, Eichmann replied, "Menschlich gesehen, ja" (From a human point of view, yes), when the prosecutor asked if he felt guilt in his heart. It was a shouting, hectoring adversary that Eichmann saw from his cage when the cross-examination began. Attorney General Gideon Hausner is an old-style prosecutor.

A tense, slightly built man with a large, balding head and a high-pitched voice, Mr. Hausner had been poised like a hawk behind the defense table, waiting for Eichmann's counsel, Dr. Robert Servatius, to finish the direct examination.

Finally, Dr. Servatius wound up his examination, which had taken nearly two weeks. After a recess Mr. Hausner began the cross-examination. The courtroom, half empty when the session began, was thronged and electric with tension. Eichmann, reappearing in his glass cage, looked shrunken and pallid. He sat down, sighed, ran his tongue over toothless gums and polished his glasses.

The black-gowned prosecutor rose to his feet and looked across the court at the prisoner.

Addressing Eichmann as "the accused," he began in a loud, high voice: "When you were interrogated by the police you said as follows: 'I know that I will be found guilty as an accomplice to murder. I know that I may be sentenced to death and I do not ask for mercy because I do not merit mercy.'

"You said that you were ready to be hanged in public to atone for your terrible crimes are you ready to repeat these words here before the court?"

Eichmann, looking flustered, was ordered to stand. He blinked nervously and his large, thin mouth twitched while the question was translated into German by the court interpreter, says the New York Times. Then he threw back his thin shoulders, looked straight at Mr. Hausner and replied firmly:

"I still stand by the words of that statement. I repeated them in reply to the final question by the defense counsel this morning."

"So," cried Mr. Hausner triumphantly, "you confess to being an accomplice to the murder of millions of Jews?"

Eichmann seemed staggered by this question. He glanced toward the defense table as though trying to catch the eye of Dr. Servatius. He began a long reply:

"That I cannot admit. As far as personal guilt is concerned, as far as my participation is concerned, I must point out that I do not consider myself guilty from a legal point of view. I was only receiving orders and carrying out orders and I was dealing with the implementation of deportations and if I had any share in them and if the Jews who were deported by me found their death, then the legal aspect of it has to be examined — whether I am to be held guilty from the point of view of personal responsibility."

Annoyed by this reply Mr. Hausner threw a disgusted look at the court. He appealed to the judges to enforce yes or no answers from the witness.

"My question is not a legal question!" he shouted at the cage. "You, in your own heart, do you find yourself guilty as an accomplice to the murder of millions of Jews — yes or no?"

"Menschlich gesehen, ja," Eichmann replied and added stammeringly: "Because I was guilty of carrying out and implementing deportations."

"Good," Mr. Hausner said. "Now, toward the end of the war you declared in the hearing of many people, as you said this morning that you would gladly leap into the grave knowing that 5,000,000 people had been wiped out along with you. You say you used the expression '5,000,000 enemies of the Reich.'

"But when you were questioned by the police you said you uttered the following remark in the hearing of your men: 'Millions of our enemies are dead, millions of Germans are dead, and I believe that in this war also 5,000,000 Jews met their death.'

"Do you mean to say that both replies are correct — that you would leap gladly into the grave because you were dragging with you 5,000,000 Jewish 'enemies of the Reich'?"

"No," Eichman replied, "I did not say 5,000,000 Jewish enemies of the Reich. When I spoke about enemies of the Reich, I meant the enemy that was storming the gates of the capital of the Reich."

Presiding Judge Moshe Landau produced a written transcript of the police interrogation and asked Eichmann to read a marked passage, says the New York Times. Eichmann, now thoroughly flustered, fumbled for his reading glasses and then held the transcript in trembling hands.

"I want an answer!" Mr. Hausner shouted. "You said 5,000,000 Jews were exterminated during ... and with that knowledge you would leap gladly into the grave."

Eichmann finally stammered: "Yes, this is a summary and it is correct. That is what I said at the time, being fully conscious of the fact that the enemies of the Reich were storming the gates of our capital. But it was not aimed at the Jews because — no, I would not have leaped gladly into the grave because of the Jews. What I said was completely distorted."

Mr. Hausner waved an accusing finger at the cage and cried: "Did you not regard the Jew as an enemy of the Reich?"

"After the declaration of war," Eichmann responded, "and after having heard the statement by the president of the (World) Zionist Organization, Dr. Chaim Weizmann, I did see in the Jews enemies of the Reich, but—"

"No 'buts,'" Mr. Hausner scolded. "I want an answer."

Judge Landau tried to soften Mr. Hausner's attack. "The accused will be permitted to complete his answer," the Judge said.

"But," resumed Eichmann, "I did not see in the Jews enemies of the Reich in the sense in which I expressed myself in the final stage of the war. At that time I regarded as arch enemies of the Reich the Red Army, which was advancing on Berlin, and the American Air Force."

Mr. Hausner made a few more futile attempts to draw from Eichmann an admission that he regarded Jews as enemies to be exterminated.

But Eichmann persisted: "I did not intend to say that I had killed 6,000,000 Jews or that I had been instrumental in killing 5,000,000 Jews, although they are on my conscience."

Mr. Hausner then launched into seemingly pointless questioning as to whether Eichmann was an anti-Semite. Here, too, he was frustrated, says the New York Times. The session ended on a note of futility. In the final hour of direct examination by Dr. Servatius, Eichmann, in a flat colorless voice, read a statement on why he felt free of legal guilt.

"Where there is no responsibility there can be no guilt," he said.

But was not Eichmann aware that at least part of the Jews he deported to Auschwitz and other death camps were being killed? Dr. Servatius asked.

"For truth's sake," replied Eichmann, "I must admit I knew that part of those deported were killed in the camps."

But he added:

"I wish to denounce and express sorrow about the extermination operation, the policy of extermination of Jews that the leadership of the German state adopted and ordered * * * I could do nothing about it. I was a tool in the hands of higher authorities and of a malignant fate."

Eichmann implied that if he had disobeyed the orders for the deportation of Jews he would have been shot.

"Under the criminal code of the SS (elite guard) and the police a breach of discipline was punishable by death," he said.

"I did everything legally possible to get transferred to another post, but failed * * *" Generals could request transfers if they could not fulfill orders, but the small man, especially if he knew secret orders, could not. Of course, he could shoot himself, but he could not object * * *"

Adolf Eichmann said that his war-time offer to trade 1,000,000 Jews for 10,000 army trucks was inspired not by pity but by bureaucratic pique, says the New York Herald Tribune. Eichmann, before the Israeli tribunal trying him for responsibility in the murder of millions of Jews, said he became infuriated in 1944 when another Nazi officer tried to encroach on his specialty — the "emigration" of Jews.

Eichmann said he had been filled with "holy wrath" because Col. Kurt Becher had arrived in Budapest with schemes to "sell" Hungarian Jews. Eichmann, a Gestapo officer, was preparing the Jews for shipment to Auschwitz, the concentration camp in Poland. Becher was a representative of Reichsfuehrer Heinrich Himmler, chief of the SS, or elite guard.

"I was fed up," cried Eichmann. "Here was someone who did not even belong to the security police trying to give instructions to me!"

Eichmann said he then decided that the only way to squelch Becher was to come up with a bigger deal. Becher, he said, had been content with negotiating the trade of small groups of Jews for foreign currency whereas he could do it wholesale. He said he figured that if he went to his Gestapo superior, Heinrich Mueller, with a proposal to exchange 1,000,000 Jews, the plan would be too big for Mueller to reject out of hand.

Dr. Robert Servatius, the defense counsel, suggested that some loftier motivation, such as pity for the Jews, might have intruded in Eichmann's plan.

Eichmann, after a moment's reflection, replied somewhat primly: "I am under oath, and must tell the truth. I did not handle this matter out of pity. I would have been hurled out of Mueller's office if I had even touched on that. I already explained what my motivations were."

This was the origin of the offer that Joel Brand, a Hungarian-born Jew, carried to Jewish leaders in the Middle East. But Mr. Brand was seized by British Agents and not permitted to return to Budapest, says the New York Herald Tribune. If Mr. Brand had returned with word that the Zionist Organization had accepted the offer, the deportations to Auschwitz would have halted immediately, Eichmann testified.

It was to be regretted, Eichmann said, that "foreign powers" killed the deal even though he had given assurances that the trucks would not be used against the Western allies but only against the Red Army on the eastern front.

"I count myself among the few who can understand the anger and pain of Joel Brand," Eichmann said.

Mr. Brand, who was in court, testified as a prosecution witness five weeks ago. His story and Eichmann's were essentially the same except on one important point. Mr. Brand and his wife, Hansi, both swore that Eichmann had promised to halt the deliveries of Jews to the death camps for two weeks pending some word from Mr. Brand. Eichmann flatly denied having made such a promise.

The Brands also testified that Eichmann had promised to blow

THE JUNKER

BY JACK LEWIS, IN THE JEWISH FRONTIER

For a short time during World War II, I was assigned to the motor-pool of a small training-field in southeastern Kansas. Usually I drove a carryall that served as a field bus. Occasionally I chauffeured the air inspector of the post, Major Vann.

Vann was a wartime prodigy, a major at twenty-four; it had taken him less than three years of instructing pilot trainees to reach his rank. Tall and dark-handsome, he carried command in every inch of his erect bearing, aloof manner and lustrous insignia. In contrast to the other officers with their droopy garrison caps, Major Vann wore a stiff garumet in his hat.

Cadets dreaded flying with him. The small training-planes had dual controls, so that an instructor could bruise a student flier's thighs with abrupt movements of his control stick. Vann beat cadets' thighs purple for the tiniest errors. He seemed to glory in being feared and hated. In any case his reputation did him no harm. He was a favorite of our commanding officer, an old West Pointer who was forever dressing men down for lacking, as he put it, "the guts to command."

The Jewish men among us referred to the Major as "von Vann" or "the Junker," a nickname implying that he was anti-Semitic. I was somewhat uncomfortable about this. At Camp Upton, where I had been inducted, an old, white-haired master sergeant had given me a private briefing on Jewish sensitivity to prejudice. "I don't go for this anti-Semitic stuff. I been in this here army since the Spanish-American War nearly, and I never once got a bad break on account of being a Jew," he told me. "You go around with a big nose sniffing for Jew-haters and you'll smell what just ain't there. Do your job and mind your business, young fella, and you'll get along fine."

Having accepted the old master sergeant's advice as eminently sensible, I was determined to smell no evil unless it hit me on the nose. It did just that one day. Waiting for the Junker outside the operations office, I overheard him discussing the latest group of cadets who were to be dropped from pilot training. He was talking with a Jewish flying officer, Captain Lempert, a stocky, card-playing, phlegmatic type who would not be likely to have a sensitive nose.

"Here's Applebaum right on top. There's a stumblebee for you," I heard the Junker say.

"I've checked him out. A foulup. He'll never fly an airplane," Lempert agreed.

"You know, Lempert, I got nothing against people of your race. But I've washed out just about every Jewish cadet I ever flew with. That's a fact." Vann had lowered his voice, so that I barely heard his words. I ducked my head stealthily through the door of the operations office. Lempert looked flushed. "Suppose you tell me why, Major," he said.

"You don't have to ask. You're a pilot yourself. I never flew with one who wouldn't get snarled up when I poured the heat on him."

"I don't mean Applebaum," Lempert insisted. "How about the others?"

"Well, being as you're twisting my arm, I'll say it. You fly an airplane by the seat of your pants. Call it instinct or feeling or reflex. But you got to work like a camera spring — bing bang! Now your Jewish boys, they're thinking all the time. It's no damn good, Lempert."

That was all I got to hear. I moved out of earshot then, for I had some scruples about eavesdropping even on talk which in an ultimate sense concerned me. Nevertheless I had heard enough to deepen my feeling of unease whenever I drove with Major Vann.

I don't recall that the Junker ever spoke to me when I drove his staff car, except to bark out an order or eat me out for not saluting him smartly enough. For the most part his duties as air inspector were rather vague. Since he spent a good deal of time closeted with the c.o., it was rumored that the two men were business partners and discussed, on government time, the Texas oil wells they owned. One of Mayor Vann's responsibilities I knew about: as soon as one of our airplanes came down on civilian property, he would get quickly over to the spot where the accident or forced landing had occurred in order to forestall unreasonable damage claims against the Army.

I was with him on the last trip of this kind that the Junker ever made. A cadet on a routine cross-country flight had run out of gas and landed in a cornfield. He had called in about his misadventure at noontime. An hour later that afternoon I was taking Major Vann on a fifty-mile drive through the dust of the windingest back roads I had ever been on. I finally caught sight of the damaged airplane in a field beyond an unpainted weatherbeaten barn, and I turned slowly into the rutted lane leading into the farm. The Junker slammed his foot down over mine on the accelerator and roared, "Give it the gun, boy! Scare the hair off this goddamn feather merchant!" I tore up to the barn like a roller coaster at Coney Island and screeched the car to a halt.

We found ourselves in a most untidy farmyard. The sour smell of a pigsty was not entirely submerged in the gaseous outpourings of a defective cesspool. Fallen fence posts and chunks of firewood lay about haphazardly; a few scrawny hens scratched about in the sawdust. The farmhouse had been built on rock piles which had settled unevenly so that the house teetered on an angle. Beyond a rusty barbed wire tangle grazed a handful of Herefords looking like the seven famished cows of Joseph's dream.

There was no sign of anyone around. The Junker had struck a number of blasts on the horn of the car before a man in a button-up grey sweater came out of the barn. It was hard to tell how old he was, though he looked terribly old. His hands seemed gnarled and twisted with arthritis, and it pained me to watch his stooped shuffle.

The Junker strode towards the farmer and slid a printed form out of a manila folder. Stiffly erect, he announced himself: "Major Vann from the Airfield. I represent the Army Air Corps in your claim for damages."

The farmer looked blankly at the Junker. "Don't know nothing about a claim," he said.

"Aw, shoot!" the Junker exclaimed. "One of our airplanes came down back there. That your property?"

"Last time the tax assessor came round it was my property."

"All right. We're willing to assume our airplane did some damage. How much?" The Junker poised his pen over the printed form and waited. The farmer studied his knobby finger joints but said nothing. "Well, how much?" Vann demanded.

The farmer's words stumbled out haltingly. "Them things is mighty hard to calculate. In a bad year . . . well now, supposing this was a bad year for farm folk. Then a stand of corn tore up don't mean much on account of the price of feed being low. Right now, a course, corn fetches a right good price if you get by corn borers and dry spells and such."

"How much? How much?" the Junker ordered. "I'll put you in for a fifty-dollar claim."

The farmer's gaze shifted to the horizon. His words came out as if they had been hobbled somewhere within him. "And I said, there's dry spells and borers and flooding rain. Seed rots without sprouting sometimes."

The Junker wrote a figure on his form and offered his pen to the farmer. "I'm sticking my neck way out and putting in a hundred-dollar claim for you. That's more than you can get for your whole goddamn crop."

The farmer ignored the pen which the Major kept darting at him like a stiletto. "You reckon so, Mister?" he asked.

"Now you just sign this so you can't go holding us up some day," the Major snapped. He thrust the form so that it brushed the farmer's chest.

The old man pushed the paper away without looking at it. "You got any cause to accuse me of being dishonest?" he said.

The Junker drew himself more erect, his eyes glaring cold fire. "You're wasting my time," he rasped. "I'm ordering you to sign. Get it — ordering. I want to get the hell out of here."

Standing there twisted and puny before the glowering young major the farmer shook his head deliberately. "No one's hindering you," he said. "I've had little schooling and I'm an ignorant man. But I ain't given to signing papers unless I know sure what I'm signing."

The Junker unclenched his tight fists and in a gentler tone set about explaining why the farmer ought to sign the form. He appealed to the old man's patriotism, pointing out that while they stood palavering there the war effort was being irretrievably impeded. When the Junker's harangue had ended, the old man shook his head again.

"Now look, Zeke, you've got me over a barrel. This is just a job I've got to do," Vann pleaded at last. "You want me to read this whole damn form through for you?" Another shake of the head from the farmer. "You got someone around who can read? . . . Let me leave this with you so you can think it over. I'll come back tomorrow to pick it up."

"No, I don't want you prowling around here. I got work to do."

The Junker took off his stiff-crowned hat and wiped the sweatband. "Goddamn!" he cried. "If they let me handle bastards like you, you'd play ball all right. Here we are dying for sonsabitches like you!"

The farmer inched himself almost erect and looked at Vann levelly. "I don't see you dying, Mister," he said. "No one invited you here and I don't ever want to see you again. I don't care about the damage that airplane did. I'm making it a gift to the Government. You go on now!"

"I'll go gladly. Just sign this paper!" the Junker fairly shrieked. In his earnestness he took hold of both arms of the old man.

The farmer glared at the Major with contempt. "You take your hands off me and get off my property. You hear me? Git!"

Vann turned slowly and limped back to the car. I jumped to open the door for him and was about to take my place at the wheel of the car when a mad impulse suddenly possessed me. I saluted the Junker and said, "Sir, I couldn't help overhearing what happened. May I have permission to try, Sir?"

He had sagged against the car seat, but he snapped himself erect and snarled, "What goddamn business is it of yours to poke your nose into? You've got a helluva lot of cheek, Soldier. Your job is driving this car."

"I'm very sorry, Sir," I said, my hands on the ignition button. I had already put the car into second gear when he tore the white form out of his folder and flung it at me. "Go ahead and speak to the old bastard. You just might be able to." He spat his words at me.

The old man looked startled and angry when he hobbled to the door of the farmhouse and found me knocking. "I told you fellows to get out, didn't I?" he demanded.

"If you please, Sir, it would save a lot of trouble . . ." I began.

He looked me over a few moments before he said, "That bully out front sent you back, I reckon."

"Oh no, I asked Major Vann to let me speak with you," I protested.

"Well, come in and set."

The dark living room-kitchen I entered touched my memory with a hundred similar rooms in which I had been as a boy on the lower East Side of New York. The round oak table with the threadbare oilcloth was familiar; so were the straight-backed chairs ringing the table, and the brown leatherette sofa with horsehair poking through its holes, and the scuffed walnut-stained bureau laden with family pictures.

I sat down at the table while the old man lit a kerosene lamp and labored through a reading of the indemnification form. From time to time he pointed to a word or phrase and asked me what it meant. I felt at ease in that dark kitchen, almost at home. The smells weren't those I was used to, but they were good, homey ones: pork chops frying on a smoky woodstove, ripening cheese and dusty dry corn, bean curd and sauerkraut. The musty-papered walls of the room were bare except for a faded, fly-specked print of General Pershing on a horse.

At last the old man dipped a battered pen into a bottle of ink. Carefully he crossed out the "100" which Major Vann had written in on the form and substituted a "1." Then he shakily traced his signature at the bottom and handed the paper to me. When I thanked him, his wrinkles creased into a grin and he said, "He shouldn't had you come in the first place. I'm obliging to folks who don't come at me like wild boars demanding things."

For a long while on our drive back to the base the Junker remained grimly silent, looking spent and depressed. Suddenly he spoke to me: "That old son of a bitch is Jewish, isn't he?"

The idea was so far-fetched that I had to choke back an impulse to laugh. "I don't know. But I doubt it, Sir," I answered.

"Oh, he's a Jew all right," Vann persisted. "The way he argued with me. Stubborn as black pitch. And the way he walked pretty near dusting the ground with his face."

"I think he has arthritis or rheumatism or something like it," I said.

"Then how come you two got along so good?"

"We speak the same language, Sir." (I intended this as irony.)

"I thought so," Vann said. "It takes a Jew to talk to a Jew."

It came to me foggily that the Junker was trying to trap me into talking back to him, goading me into insubordination. I was able to control myself but after a time I said, "That was unealled for, Sir." He kept looking silently out of his side window.

After this incident I avoided driving duty for Major Vann. I considered bringing a charge of prejudice against him, hoping that I could induce Captain Lempert to support me. But while I was still brooding about it, the Junker disappeared from the airfield: a clerk at headquarters confided in me that Major Vann had suddenly applied for combat duty as a B-25 pilot.

Major Vann was killed a few months later in a raid on a German factory city. What made Major Vann throw over the safety of a pilot training-school in the States? Patriotism? Restlessness? A hunger to pit his will to live against the enemy's cunning? The bite in the farmer's words, "I don't see you dying, Mister"?

Human Rights And Religion: A Jewish Point Of View

BY DR. MAURICE L. PERLZWEIG, DIRECTOR OF THE INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT OF THE WORLD JEWISH CONGRESS, IN NEW YORK

Judaism is patient of many interpretations. During its life of more than three thousand years it has given birth to many schools of thought, has been harmonized with many philosophies and adapted itself to the needs of a great variety of societies and environments. But never during all these centuries has it regarded the scriptural doctrine of universalism, based as it is on the Jewish conception of God and man, as other than of the substance of its faith. Without universalism Judaism would cease to be Jewish.

"In the image of God created He him; male and female created He them." In this simple sentence from the first chapter of Genesis is embodied the fundamental doctrine of the rights of human personality which the religious genius of ancient Israel gave to the world, which reached its highest expression in Hebrew prophecy and which Rabbinic Judaism expounded and developed.

Human rights in the faith and tradition of Judaism derive their validity from a source other and greater than any human authority; and they are shared equally by all human beings, irrespective of race, creed, or sex, and however lowly, primitive, or even criminal. Social contracts, constitutions, or legislation do not confer these rights; their function is to recognize and safeguard them. And human power which lays a sacrilegious hand upon them is guilty of constructive treason against the sovereignty of God.

It was not only the Hebrew prophets who, often in defiance of constituted authority, expressed this revolutionary doctrine in language of unexcelled power and insight. Consider the book of Ruth, which is sometimes regarded by popular imagination as mere folklore, which found its way into the Canon. Ruth was a Moabitess who embraced the faith of Israel. She was a daughter of the hereditary enemies of the House of Israel. Yet she was destined to become the ancestress of King David, and, through him, of the Messiah. Ruth is the Jewish answer to the contemporary doctrine of racism. It is a melancholy reflection that the influence of this Biblical idyll, no more than science or human insight, has been able to overcome this monstrous evil in the hearts of men who loudly profess their adherence to Biblical teaching.

It is an ignorant, if popular, fallacy to ascribe a racial quality to Judaism. The Jews in no sense constitute a "race". The Jewish people neither claims, nor attaches any value to, "racial" homogeneity. Every convert to Judaism becomes "a son of Abraham." Racialism, in all its forms and derivatives, is abhorrent to the Jewish tradition. Biblical teaching prescribed one law for the resident alien and the home-born, a doctrine which some contemporary states might usefully study. And the same high authority commanded the Israelite to "Love the stranger as yourself, for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt."

All these doctrines were renewed, developed, and expounded in the immense corpus of post-Biblical Rabbinical literature on which contemporary Judaism, in all its forms, is founded. A Rabbinical parable, for example, tells us that when God created man out of the dust of the earth he gathered it from all the four corners of the earth so that none might claim superiority because of his place of birth. And in this context we may usefully be reminded that the Rabbis did not regard salvation, however it may be conceived, as a sectarian prerogative or monopoly.

Today we are happily no longer alone in this. But Judaism has for many centuries taught "that the righteous of all peoples have a place in the world to come." And in the Middle Ages, when they themselves were often the victims of persecutions, the great philosophers of Judaism had the daring and insight to assert that if Judaism had its distinctive place and mission in the spiritual economy of mankind, so too did Christianity and Islam.

It is the Jew's stubborn loyalty to his universalistic heritage which is the fundamental reason for the enmity he has evoked from a long succession of tyrannies. So long as he keeps the Sabbath, whereon "master and servant are alike," and so long as he commemorates in the Passover the birth of freedom, any system which denies human rights must regard him as incurably subversive of its aims. To destroy the Jew, or at least to rob him of his heritage, must sooner or later be one of the purposes of every enemy of human rights, whether he calls himself Nazi, Fascist, or by any other name. It is at once the glory and the tragedy of the Jew that he cannot come to terms with tyranny. His Book, his faith, and his history always stand in the way.

Having survived the ordeals of all the Jewish centuries, the Jew is less than ever inclined to put his trust in princes, or parliaments. He continues to affirm in the contemporary world the divine right of every human being to freedom. "All men," says the American Declaration of Independence, "have been created equal and have been endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights."

It is this essentially Jewish idea, and not the change in sovereignty, over which, indeed, the Americans long hesitated, which gave the American Revolution its revolutionary quality. We are entitled to hope that the heirs and successors of Jefferson and Lincoln, as well as their counterparts in other lands, will continue to strive to lift the issue of human rights out of the context of local or national superstition and prejudice.

The World Jewish Congress, in its first submission to the United Nations as an international organization in consultative status, affirmed, on the morrow of the Nazi holocaust, its belief in "the common origin, the common right, and the common destiny of all mankind." Like every Jewish organization faithful to the obligations of its heritage it seeks, and will continue to seek, to broaden the obligations and jurisdiction of the international community in the field of human rights, whether through special international instruments or the strengthening of the United Nations.

In the international community it will fight for equal human rights for all; and in the national community it will seek to give substance to these rights through support for the principle of religious and cultural pluralism, which is today one of the distinguishing marks of a civilized society.

In the achievement of these purposes religion has a foremost part to play, not one religion, but all the great religions. And while Judaism will obdurately remain itself, and continue to exercise the right of non-conformity, it will seek to serve purposes in fellowship, organized or not, with other religions. On this fellowship will in large measure depend not only the freedom and welfare of the human family but, in this age of mutual terror, its very survival.

FORMER NAZI COLLEAGUES OF EICHMANN, WHO TESTIFIED IN WEST GERMANY RECENTLY

up the gas chambers and crematories at Auschwitz as soon as the offer was accepted. Mrs. Brand said further that when her husband had failed to return to Budapest, Eichmann summoned her and warned that the death mills would "start grinding again."

None of this was true, Eichmann said. He was powerless, he said, either to halt the killings at Auschwitz or start them again.

"I told Joel Brand as well as Mrs. Brand and Dr. (Israel) Kastner (Hungarian Jewish leader later assassinated by fanatics in Israel) that the deportations would not be halted until Joel Brand came back with the declaration that the proposal had been accepted by the Jewish organizations abroad," the defendant asserted.

Eichmann's testimony that the sole motivation of his proposal was indignation over Becher's intrusion into his sphere of activity fitted the image of a robot-like bureaucrat that Dr. Servatius tried to make of his client.

Becher, now a wealthy grain merchant in Bremen, testified under examination in West Germany last month that Eichmann had sabotaged Himmler's orders to halt the killing of Jews, says the New York Herald Tribune. Becher's evidence was read to the trial record over the strenuous objections of Dr. Servatius, who described Becher as "a wily and cunning merchant."

Dr. Servatius complained that Becher was shown the questions to be asked in cross-examination several days before he had appeared in the German court.

Becher was sent to Hungary by Himmler to extort Jewish money and equipment for the SS after Himmler had decided to halt the killings and to sell exit permits to wealthy Jews, Eichmann testified. Becher, Eichmann said, even pressed him to speed the deportations to increase tension among the Jews and soften them up for the extortions.

Himmler's earlier instructions had been to deny emigration to all Jews except in special cases involving the interests of the Reich. Eichmann felt that these cases had to be decided at the top since not even Mueller had the authority to act on them.

Yet, Eichmann said, here was Becher "sitting on my neck" and daring to say that Jews who could offer enough foreign currency or property could make it to Switzerland.

His anger increased, the defendant said, when he learned that the German counter-espionage service was also in the business of selling exit permits. Meanwhile, he had to continue the "dirty work of deportation," he complained.

Eichmann said he therefore assigned subordinates to sound out Jews on what they might offer for 100,000 or 200,000 Jews.

"One day Joel Brand came to my office," he testified. "How and where he came from and who was the man who sent him I cannot say from memory. But I can still see Joel Brand sitting in my office. I still remember that I mentioned the figures 100,000 and 200,000 and then raised it to 1,000,000.

"This was psychologically sound for I recalled that Mueller would not listen to small offers. I also invented the ten per cent clause because I imagined Brand would find it difficult to succeed abroad without guarantees of some kind."

The ten per cent clause represented an Eichmann promise to release 100,000 Jews as a token of good faith as soon as Mr. Brand had returned with a favorable reply.

"I thought 100,000 across the border would be good emissaries to advance the proposition," he explained, says the New York Times. Eichmann said he went to Berlin and "I could hardly believe my ears when I was told that the plan had been approved." He said he had chosen Mr. Brand for the mission because "he impressed me as being serious and an idealist."

Eichmann said he was sent to Hungary in March, 1944, as head of a special squad to deport all Jews from Hungary, the last remaining reservoir of Jews in central Europe. But arrangements for the deportations were actually carried out by Edmund Veesenmayer, Reich plenipotentiary in Budapest and an SS major general named Winkelmann, he said.

"I know what I say sounds unbelievable but I had little to do," Eichmann remarked.

At the prosecution table, Attorney General Gideon Hausner and his aides broke into laughter when Eichmann went on to say he had not even been responsible for drawing up timetables for deportation trains. He had a staff of fifteen to twenty persons and they just sat around, Eichmann insisted.

"Nobody came to your office and perfect quiet and serenity prevailed there?" Dr. Servatius asked. Eichmann looked sharply at his counsel as though he suspected sarcasm. "Would you like to answer?" Dr. Servatius persisted.

Eichmann then began his bitter denunciation of Becher, who had "usurped" the deportation business, he said. He denied he had anything to do with the arrests of Jews or the confiscation of property.

Eichmann was especially emphatic in denying any responsibility for the "death march" by 50,000 Jews from Budapest to the Austrian border in November, 1944. "I did not initiate the march and I had no share in its organization, supervision or anything else," he said.

Dr. Servatius read a dispatch from files of the Nazi Foreign Ministry purporting to show that as early as April, 1944, the Nazis were considering deporting Hungarian Jews by forced marches to the Reich for work in war plants or fortifications.

The prosecution has charged that the "death march" was Eichmann's device to circumvent Himmler's order to halt the killings, says the New York Times. Also the prosecution says, he deliberately sent aged Jews and children trudging in wintry weather to the frontier knowing that many would die in route.

WORLD JEWISH CONGRESS SEEKS NAZI VICTIMS AS WITNESSES

The World Jewish Congress in New York has issued an appeal to Nazi victims to come forward with information concerning a number of Nazis about to be tried in West Germany. Information is wanted concerning:

(1) All Nazis responsible for the annihilation and deportation of the Jews in Lublin (Poland) and districts.

(2) SS - Sturmbannfuehrer Martin Fellenz who was chief of staff of the Cracow Police Chief Julian Schorner.

(3) All Gestapo Jewish "experts" in Cracow.

(4) All Nazi officials responsible for mass murders in Starachowice.

SS - Sturmbannfuehrer Fellenz organized and headed deportations in many places including Tarnow, Przemysl, Rzeszow, Miechow and in Michailowice. Witnesses who were at the last mentioned camp are particularly sought.

Nazi victims who are in the position to give testimony are requested to get in touch with Dr. Nehemiah Robinson, Director, Institute of Jewish Affairs, World Jewish Congress, 15 East 84 Street, New York 28, N.Y.

JEWS FROM HUNGARY REASSURED ON CLAIMS AGAINST GERMANY

Dr. Nahum Goldmann, president of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, assured a delegation of the World Federation of Hungarian Jews, consisting of Dr. Frederic Gorog, president; Rabbi Eugene Duschinsky, Nicholas Nanasi, Oscar Sunshine, and Dr. Erwin Farkas, secretary general of the Federation, that the claims of the Nazi victims who fled Hungary after 1953 and mainly after the 1956 revolution, will be recognized by West Germany. "There are good hopes for a favorable solution of this problem," Dr. Goldmann told the delegation.

The World Federation of Hungarian Jews earlier appealed to the West German Chancellor, in the "name of justice and fairness to rectify the wrongs done to thousands of Hungarian Jewish victims of Nazi persecution, who by only an act of God were prevented from reaching the free world in time to be entitled to apply for their claims under the Compensation Law." Dr. Goldmann said he would continue his negotiations with the West German Government on this issue.

The delegation expressed to Dr. Nahum Goldmann its appreciation for his untiring efforts in the interest of the Hungarian Jewish victims of Nazi persecution. Plans for the establishment of a Hungarian-Jewish scientific and historical institute; and organizational matters of World Federation of Hungarian Jews were also discussed.
